Narrowing Your Topic with Reference Resources

What are Reference Resources?

Sources of information that give you general overviews or background information on broad topics areas. You can typically find this type of information in Encyclopedias or in specialized Reference Databases like Issues and Controversies, Gale Virtual Reference Library, or Credo Reference.

Why should I use Reference Resources before I start my research?

Two reasons:

• For a general overview of your topic.
  ➢ Can you talk about your topic for one minute without repeating yourself? Reference Resources will give you broad overview of a topic area – the things experts already recognize as “common knowledge” about your topic.

• To narrow your topic. Most research topics students choose are too broad. Reference resources help students to narrow in on a specific aspect of a broad topic by explaining:
  ➢ The main ideas or key concepts within your topic
  ➢ Historical context or how the topic conversation has developed over time
  ➢ Potential problem or controversies within your topic
  ➢ Potential causes or solutions to the problems

I’ve read some Reference Resources on my topic. Now what?

• Focus in on ONE aspect or issue to research. Focus on an aspect that is worth investigating and distinct enough that you can work with it.

• Try to write your focused topic as a QUESTION. This question will guide your research.

Characteristics of a GOOD Research Question:

➢ The answer to your question is not immediately obvious. It cannot be answered with Yes, No, or a definition. You should have to explain, defend, or argue the answer to your question.

➢ Your question forces a different view of the issue.

➢ Your question highlights an inconsistency, inaccuracy, or incompleteness in an accepted position or argument.
How do I access the online Reference Resources in the Library?

- Start at the HTC Library website: www.hennepintech.edu/library
- Go to the Find a Database tab
- In the “Subject” drop-down menu, select Topic Development/Reference.
